Section A: Research Methods

For Examiner's Use

1 Positivist sociologists prefer quantitative methods of data collection. Quantitative data is often collected by means of a social survey in which the researcher gathers responses from questionnaires or structured interviews. Whichever method is used, the researcher has to identify a sample. However, the type of sample they choose will have a significant effect on the validity of the results obtained.

The researcher must also decide whether to carry out a pilot study. The results of a pilot study will enable plans to be reviewed and may help decide which sampling method to use. The variety of sampling methods available to the researcher is vast, including random sampling, quota sampling, stratified sampling and the rarely-used snowball sampling. Each of these types of sampling has strengths but with each there are limitations. However, the choice of sampling method will influence the outcome of the research, as will the accuracy of the sampling frame.

Other researchers reject quantitative research methods in favour of qualitative methods.

Section B: Culture and Socialisation

For Examiner's Use

2 There are different views about the factors that shape human behaviour. One view is that human nature is the main factor, while another view emphasises the importance of nurture.

(a) What is meant by the term nurture?

.....

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two ways in which a child can be nurtured.

.....

3 Conflict theorists believe that social order is imposed through the use of coercion. However, functionalists argue that social order is achieved through shared values.

For Examiner's Use

(a) What is meant by the term coercion?

.....

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two agencies that have the power to use coercion.

Section C: Social Stratification and Inequality

For Examiner's Use

4 Marxist sociologists have suggested that modern industrial societies have undergone a process of proletarianisation, through which white-collar work has become deskilled. Deskilling has also occurred amongst blue-collar workers.

(a) What is meant by the term blue-collar workers?

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two examples of deskilling.

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....[4]

(c) Explain why some types of employment are more likely to experience deskilling.

For Examiner's Use

.... [6]

(d) Assess the extent to which proletarianisation has occurred.

5 Stratification continues to be a feature of almost all societies, though there may be less inequality in modern industrial societies than in traditional societies. Social class is the basis of stratification in modern industrial societies, and in some of these societies an aristocracy remains part of the class system.

For Examiner's Use

(a) What is meant by the term aristocracy?

.....

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two examples of social inequality.

.....

Section D: Power and Authority

For Examiner's Use

6 It has been claimed that, even in democratic political systems, elite groups control the power of the state.

(a) What is meant by the term the state?

.....

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two political systems.

.....

7 It is claimed that class de-alignment has occurred in some modern industrial societies and that this is affecting voting behaviour. In these societies the concept of political socialisation would seem irrelevant.

For Examiner's Use

(a) What is meant by the term class de-alignment?

.....

.....

.....

.....[2]

(b) Describe two influences on voting behaviour, apart from social class.

.....
