Part 3: Translation

Translate the following passage into Urdu.

On the island of Mauritius, near Africa, lived a large bird that could not fly. Because it was the biggest animal on the island it had no enemies. It weighed up to 14 kg and was very good to eat. It was called the dodo.

The dodo was first seen by Europeans in 1507. They introduced domestic animals as well as rats and monkeys to the island, and these started killing the bird and taking its place. In addition to this, forest clearing destroyed the bird's habitat. This meant that the dodo population began to decline rapidly. By 1681 there were no dodos left.

In the present day, there is much more information available about animals and birds that are in danger of dying out. Some animals are hunted for their skins, such as the tiger and polar bear, or for their meat and oils, such as the whale. Scientists are trying to make people aware of the need to protect all living things. They warn us that some animals will soon die out completely. People need to protect these animals from being killed and traded illegally, otherwise history will repeat itself.
