Section A: Research Methods

Secondary data is often used in sociological research. It can be used in different types of sociological study. Sociologists often examine official statistics when they are seeking to gather statistical data about general changes in society. This way of gathering data is often used by sociologists who favour collecting quantitative data.

Other sociologists have a different view of how society should be studied. They seek to collect qualitative data and will often use personal records, such as letters, newspaper articles, television reports and historical documents. Such data helps to provide insights into how individuals make sense of the world in which they live.

Secondary data can support primary data, but there are a number of problems associated with its use. The validity of the data can be called into question and the data may not always provide the exact information required.
